NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

April 21, 1981

MEMORANDUM FOR RICHARD V. ALLEN

FROM: ALLEN J. LENZ ajl

SUBJECT: Removal of Grain Embargo

Though I have a feeling that the decision has already been made, I want to cast my lot with those recommending against a removal at this time of the limitations (not embargo!) on grain shipments to the Soviets. Briefly, several points:

- Advocates of removal sometimes argue that it has hurt the American farmer, but not the Soviets. It's hard to have it both ways. To the extent that Soviet consumption of an internationally traded commodity has been reduced, world market prices may be lowered to the detriment of American farmers. But if the embargo has not been successful, then Soviet imports from the world have not been lowered and world demand, and hence world prices, remain unimpaired.
- Farmers, neither individually or as a group, can be said to have suffered unduly from the limitations on shipments. If Soviet imports have been reduced, the effects on U.S. farmers, if any, have been transmitted in somewhat lower world grain prices than would otherwise have pertained. On the other hand, restrictions on exports of manufactured goods generally translate directly to lost sales -- not sales at lower prices -- that may have a significant bearing on profits and employment -- even the survival -- of individual companies.
- If any logic is to prevail, removal of the restrictions on grain sales will require removal of the total embargo on Occidental Petroleum's export of super phosphoric acid to the U.S.S.R. (this embargo was put in place to mollify farmers who complained that the fertilizer manufactured from the s.p.a. exports acted to increase Soviet grain production). This is a one million ton per year barter arrangement (we take back ammonia). The local rep of Occidental called me on Monday, seeking my assurance that he should advise Armand Hammer, about to leave for the U.S.S.R., that there was little chance of a near term removal of the restrictions on grain that would allow a similar removal of restrictions on the s.p.a. exports. I assured him that the chances were, indeed, slim, and that Hammer should not be hopeful. However, having come from the Staff meeting just before the phone call, I didn't feel as confident as I hope I sounded.

- A removal of the restrictions will generate some domestic political capital and make good on one specific campaign pledge. However, it will also generate large losses of foreign political capital and credibility and make more difficult fulfilling the broader campaign pledge to lead the Western Allies in new, concerted policies to deal with Soviet aggression.
- I find it incredible that the restrictions would be removed before the forthcoming summit. If they are to be removed this should only be done after explanation to our Allies of the reasons for doing so, even if the rationale is only "domestic political necessity."
- A removal of the restrictions prior to the Summit meeting would seem to me to destroy our moral position and credibility with our Allies to an extent that would doom our prospects of successfully advancing at the Economic Summit the concept of "economic security" and related efforts concerning the Yamal pipeline.
