Dear President Reagan,

First I would like to congratulate you on being elected as our President of the United States of America.

I have faith that we will lick inflation and whatever other obstacles that face us. It is really something when one thinks back in history what we have accomplished. In 1775 we were quite small. Even though the odds were great we over came them. We are larger now but with positive thinking and positive attitudes I know we the people of the United States of America will go forward.

Mr. President, hearing about your jelly benas got me to thinking. Maybe at times you would like to have something else to eat, so I am sending you some of our licorice.

I work for the Y & S Candies Inc. in Lancaster, Pennsylvania as their electrician. It is a great place in which to work. The people are nice, management works with its employees as a team and we are striving toward better productivity. I feel this is one way to help stop inflation. Less waste, better products, pride in our work. It sure makes sense. No matter how small a company may be with a positive outlook we can make a dent in these inflationary times.

When people say, what's the use, what can a hand full of us do, then the words from a well-known song come to my mind—if we all would light just one little candle what a bright world this would be!

If you enjoy our candy let us know. Our plant manager is
Mr. Ed Maloy. Y & S Candies Inc. 400 Running Pump Road Lancaster, Pa.

Dear Mr. President:

Congratulations on your victory! All of us here at the "Popcorn Works" are pulling for you for the next four years. If anyone can do something for America, I feel sure you are the man. You have our blessings and prayers.

I'd also like you to have a taste of my gourmet popcorn - I understand you are a popcorn snacker like so many others.

I think you will notice that this popcorn is really different from any other you have ever tasted. It has never before been offered to home poppers, so I doubt you have ever tasted anything like it.

Please enjoy this gift, and if you would just happen to get a craving for more, I'd be only too happy to send you some.

Wishing you the very best and hoping you can get U.S. out of this hole we're presently stuck in, I am---

Just another American pulling for you,

Dear Mr. Ambassador:

Thank you and Mrs. Donlon once more for your warm hospitality at the Saint Patrick's Day luncheon. I was delighted to join fellow Irishmen on this special day, and your daughter Monica's lovely rendition of the Gaelic melody added a distinct touch to the occasion.

I want to express my thanks for the generous remembrances which you and Eugene Fitzgerald presented for Nancy and me. The impressive heraldic manuscript on my Irish ancestry will have a unique place among my family memorabilia. I also appreciated receiving the beautiful Belleek basket, and Nancy is delighted with the Irish silver dish. We are grateful for the friendship represented by these splendid gifts.

Nancy joins me in sending you and Mrs. Donlon every good wish.

Dear Mr. Minister:

I wanted you to know how much I enjoyed the Saint Patrick's Day luncheon at the Irish Embassy. The camaraderie I felt among my fellow Irishmen was most gratifying and deeply appreciated.

Thank you again for the handsome gifts which you and Ambassador Donlon presented for Nancy and me. As I have written the Ambassador, the specially executed pedigree on the Reagan ancestry is a most welcome addition to my family memorabilia. I was also pleased to receive the handsome Belleek basket, and Nancy is delighted to have the Irish silver dish. We shall cherish these thoughtful remembrances of Irish friendship.

Nancy and I send our best wishes to you and Mrs. Fitzgerald.

Really O'Reagan

St. Pat's With the Irish

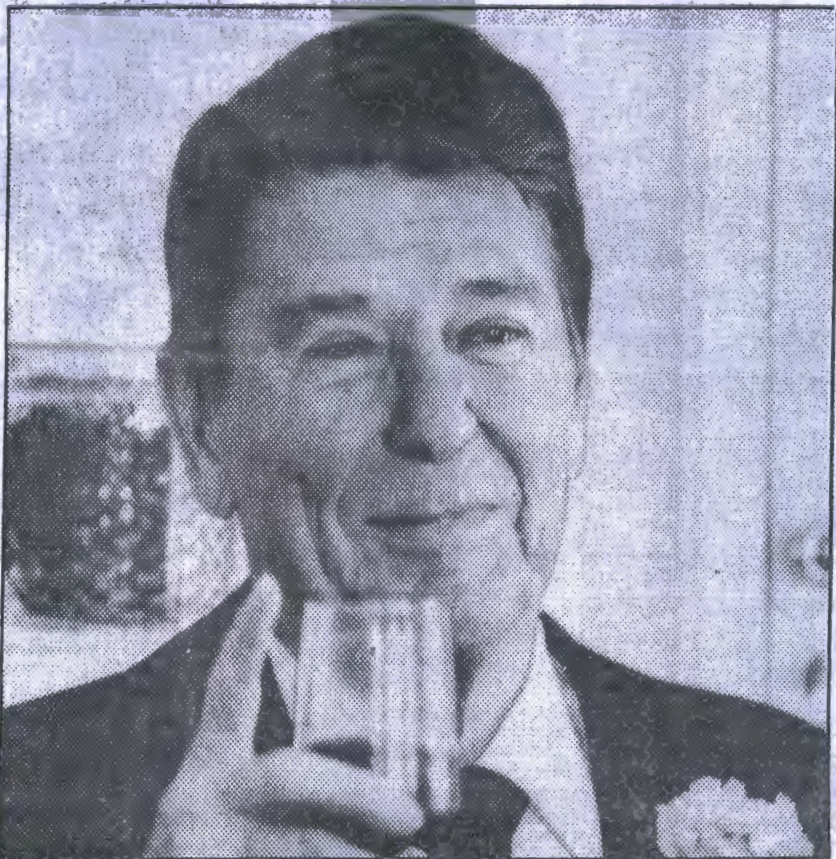

By Joseph McLellan

"This morning," said President Ronald Reagan, "Sen. Laxalt tried to give me a big, green button with 'Honorary Irishman' printed on it. I told that son of the Basques, 'I'm not honorary — I am.'"

It was lunchtime on St. Patrick's Day at the Irish ambassador's residence, and the president had just been handed an ornate, handwritten scroll tracing his Irish ancestry. He was delighted not only at this rebuttal to such doubters as Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.) but for the chance to get in touch with his roots.

"My father was orphaned at the age of 6," Reagan said, "and I grew up not knowing or hearing anything of my family tree. I understand that the Reagans and the Regans are the same family. The other day, I told Secretary of the Treasury [Donald T.] Regan that some branches of the family just can't handle all those letters. But later I discovered that the Regans are generally professors and administrators and members of the educated class, and the Reagans are members of the laboring class."

Reagan drew applause with the announcement that he had nominated William McCann as ambassador to Ireland, and drew laughter from the 40 guests with one of his father's favorite lines about the Irish in America: "The Irish built the jails and then filled them."

"He used to sound pleased when he said that," Reagan added. "I didn't understand at first, until I realized he was talking about the high proportion of Irishmen in the police."

The president walked in decked out in a red necktie and green carnation, to the tune of a Tipperary march played on the Irish pipes — a less vigorous and more melodic instrument than the more familiar Scottish bagpipes. The piper, Tomás O'Canainn, later introduced by Irish Ambassador Sean Donlon as the leading performer on the instrument, provided music at the luncheon. Before the exchange of toasts with Irish coffee, Donlon's daughter Monica sang what she called "a typical lighthearted love song about a man who is in love with a beautiful, red-haired girl but loses her to another."

Reagan, glowing with Hibernitude, gave her a jar of green jelly beans and told her, "When the Irish sing a song, all who hear it wish they were Irish."

From Donlon and Ireland's Finance

Minister Gene Fitzgerald, Reagan received not only the scroll but an Irish-made china basket and, for First Lady Nancy Reagan, a bowl made of Irish silver with Celtic designs. America held a clear balance of trade on this transaction, but Fitzgerald hinted broadly that he will try to get a return on the investment.

After hailing everyone present as "Fellow Irishmen" — including the Netherlands ambassador who was made an honorary Irishman on the spot — Fitzgerald talked about the enormous progress made by the Irish in the United States, owing to "the great traditions of democracy, generosity and freedom."

Then he began invoking the Irish ancestry of the president and members of his cabinet: "The secretary of state, I understand, has Murphys on his mother's side," he said. "I intend to explore that relationship further this afternoon." He added that Ireland is a bastion of free enterprise and "we are glad to provide conditions in which the European operations of American firms can flourish more profitably."

The small and predominantly male guest list was drawn from such predominantly male areas as the Cabinet, diplomatic corps, clergy, news media and congressional leadership, as well as representatives of major Irish-American organizations. As happens frequently when a critical mass of Irish males are enclosed in one room, the atmosphere was heavily political. "Well," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D.-Mass.), shaking the hand of Ambassador-designate McCann, "you have at least one vote for confirmation."

With Speaker of the House Thomas P. ("Tip") O'Neill, McCann fell into the traditional pastime of trading names of friends, relatives and hometowns. "Which McCanns do you belong to?" asked O'Neill. "I'm from Lowell," said McCann. "I live down in New Jersey, now. I have a life-insurance company there: Foundation Life."

It turned out, as it almost always does, when Irish politicians, gather, that McCann and O'Neill were sort of related: McCann's father-in-law had played in the same high school band with O'Neill. "He said to tell you he was the big, fat kid who used to play in the band," McCann said. O'Neill registered instant recognition.

Ambassador Donlon, passing by, paused to say, "Mr. Speaker, I like your tie." O'Neill's bright green tie was held by a shamrock tie clip and decorated with pictures of leprechauns. "The leprechaun works in my office," said O'Neill, "and it's wonderful. The walls have ears when a leprechaun's around. People ask me, 'How did you know that?' and I say, 'The leprechaun told me.'"

Irish embassy officials said the event marked the first time an American president had visited the Irish Embassy on St. Patrick's Day.

"I invited him and he accepted. It was as simple as that," Donlon said. "I wanted the occasion to have dignity with informality. I hope it did."

The Reagan family's Irish origins have been traced in a document prepared by the Debrette Ancestry service. The study was distributed at the luncheon by the Irish Embassy. Debrette found a likely Reagan ancestor in "an O'Regan family gravestone at Ballyporeen," where a Michael O'Regan's baptism in 1824 is recorded. The president's ancestors apparently left for America during the famine of 1845-'49 from a town land of 229 acres called Doolis, which is now farm land, "some two miles west of Ballyporeen village and up a small road."

President and Mrs. Ronald Reagan
Washington, D.C.

Dear President and Mrs. Reagan,

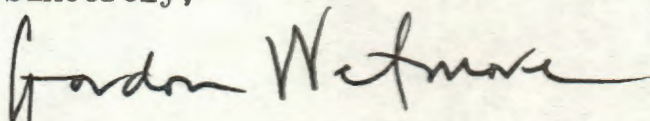

Sam Moore, the President of Thomas Nelson Publishers, and I would like for you to have this copy of my new book on Ireland.

Because of President Reagan's Irish heritage, we thought you might especially enjoy it.

Richard Allen took an interest in my early career and was a great help to me.

We wish you the best for your term in office and our prayers and support are with you.

Sincerely,

Gordon Wetmore
