Dear Joe:

Thank you for your letter of August 2nd with regard to the Nissan plant and the President visiting it for the opening. As you had mentioned that time of year will be very busy as the President will be preparing for the Far East trip. However I have taken the liberty of sending your request to Scheduling to see what can be worked out.

I will keep you informed.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Dear Mike:

~~This letter is written to urge your consideration for a visit by the President to Tennessee. Marvin Runyon, President of Nissan USA, has written you requesting the President attend the official opening of the Nissan plant in Smyrna, Tennessee, October 21st.~~

As you may know, this plan represents the largest investment by a Japanese company anywhere in the world. There is a strong possibility that several of the members of the Japanese government will be in attendance at this opening.

I realize the political atmosphere around the October date may influence whether the President will actually come or not, but Mr. Runyon is willing to accept that risk. It is also understood that because you are planning a trip to Japan in November there may be some reason why the October 21st event would not be appropriate or, on the other hand, would be most appropriate.

We do, however, appreciate your consideration and look forward to knowing whether there is a possibility for this visit as soon as you can let us know.

Look forward to seeing from you.

Sincerely,

Joe M. Rodgers

Dear Mr. Deaver - Michael:

~~One can depend upon Michael Deaver to display brilliance, fantastic creativity, and certainly great ability and judgment.~~ For those reasons, choosing ~~Lyn P. Meyerhoff~~ to be the Alternate Delegate to the UN was superb. Michael, being that Lyn P. Meyerhoff is a genuine thrill.

Comedy aside, I accept this appointment with a great sense of dedication to this Administration and will do the very best job I'm capable of doing. I want to formally thank the President, and you, for this honor and opportunity to serve our country.

Dear Mike:

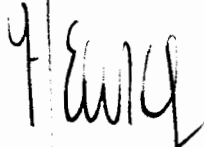

I always knew you were ~~trustworthy, kind, reverent, honest~~
~~and a gem-of-a-fellow~~ ~~and here is the proof in Time~~ Magazine.

I see you really did give the President my crystal
"Presidential seal" - there it is on his desk.

One of these days when I am in Washington and when you have a moment free (ha, ha! - that's the best joke of all) it would be nice to see you again.

I can't think of anything I want (this is the only letter like this you'll get this week) but I like to see you every once in a while to see if you are getting older than me.

Warmest regards,

HENRY O. DORMANN
President & Editor-in-Chief

tioner at Reagan's news conference noted that the units involved in the maneuvers have orders to defend themselves if they are fired upon. The President replied that this is a standard order to all U.S. military forces everywhere. He amplified: "We don't want war, but I don't think that you prevent war by letting your personnel out there become the victims."

It was precisely to cope with doubts such as those expressed in Congress that Reagan two weeks ago appointed a twelve-man commission headed by former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. The commission's charter is to study all aspects of Central American policy and recommend a long-range plan judged capable of winning bipartisan support. But the momentum of events may not wait for the commission's report, and much of that momentum has been spurred by the Administration itself. Visiting Washington last week to get the commission organized, Kissinger announced plans to conduct a study so comprehensive that its conclusions will not be ready until February. The Administration long before then will have to offer a more convincing explanation of its purposes in Central America if it is to retain enough public support to carry out its policies. Said the Raleigh (N.C.) News & Observer, in an editorial headlined LATIN POLICY BLUSTER: "If President Reagan encouraged any hopes that the bipartisan commission he appointed might broaden his view of Central America, he is doing everything possible to douse them."

In fact, Reagan and his advisers may need to think the strategy through themselves considerably more thoroughly than they have done to date. The decisions that are causing so much uproar have been taken largely in response to the pace of events, and they have led to major disagreements within the Government. The military and naval maneuvers, to take the most prominent example, have been justified by the Administration partly as a response to a reported increase in the number of Cuban military advisers and the quantity of arms from Soviet-bloc countries showing up in Nicaragua. But the significance—and the extent—of that reported buildup is still in dispute within both the State Department and the CIA. Indeed, the maneuvers appear to have been prompted primarily by simple impatience to do something dramatic. It is indicative of the problem that what turned out to be the spectacularly maladroit timing of the start of the maneuvers was dictated by a trivial consideration: Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger thought that diverting the aircraft carrier Ranger to the Nicaraguan coast from a scheduled cruise to the Far East would save fuel.

Policy made in such an ad hoc manner has left important questions unanswered. Is the U.S. in fact committed to overturning Nicaragua's Sandinista government, or only to harassing it enough to keep it from fomenting Marxist revolution throughout Central America? Reagan and his advisers have made statements that can be interpreted either way. How serious is the Administration about promoting negotiations for a regional agreement that would ban all foreign military advisers and cross-border arms shipments in Central America? Reagan last week had Special Envoy Richard Stone hand-carry a letter to the Presidents of the so-called Contadora countries (Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama, which first met last January on the Panamanian island of Contadora) praising their efforts to work out such a regional pact. In so doing he quite unintentionally joined, of all people, Cuban President Fidel Castro, who lauded the Contadorans' efforts. But the Administration at the same time gave a cautious reception to a Nicaraguan offer to participate in multilateral peace talks and negotiate six specific points. Indeed, Reagan's letter to the Contadora Presidents stressed the need for democracy in the region in terms that seemed to imply that an internal transformation of Nicaragua's Sandinista regime would have to accompany any regional compact.

Most basic of all, perhaps, are questions about who is making U.S. policy, whatever that policy is. State Department officials complain strongly that, in the words of one, "we are suddenly out of the information loop on a lot of stuff." One top diplomat talks of the "crazy kooks" in the Pentagon who in his view are putting too much emphasis on military moves. Any such kooks do not include the Joint Chiefs, who have made it plain that they are concerned about increased military involvement in the region. Jeane Kirkpatrick, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, has been widely regarded as the Administration's intellectual guru on Latin American policy. She has argued long, hard and convincingly within Administration councils that the loss of Central America to Communist revolutionary regimes would be a devastating blow to U.S. security interests. But Kirkpatrick learned about the naval maneuvers from a reporter's questions. She is believed to consider the timing of the military ventures as very poor.

Newer and lesser-known names are rising to prominence. One is Fred Iklé, 58, Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, a scholarly, low-voiced, pinstripe hawk who favors putting maximum pressure on the Sandinista regime. He has the ear of Weinberger, who according to Pentagon colleagues has been too preoccupied with budget matters and congressional relations to devote much personal attention to Central America. The Secretary is believed to allow Iklé and Deputy Assistant Secretary Nestor Sanchez to shape the Pentagon position that Weinberger presents at interagency meetings.

Against the contras: Congressman Boland briefing journalists

But if there is a key figure on Central American policy, it is National Security Adviser Clark. A former California state supreme court judge, an intimate of Reagan's since the mid-'60s, when he was chief of staff to the then Governor of California, Clark had no foreign policy experience when Reagan brought him to Washington in 1981. He is motivated primarily by a nearly fanatic devotion to Reagan's interests and a visceral anti-Communism.

Clark's first job in the Administration was deputy to then Secretary of State Alexander Haig, who argued vociferously that the Soviet Union was going to "test" the U.S. in Central America by promoting leftist revolution. Haig went so far as to draw up contingency plans for blockading Cuba to prevent the shipment of Soviet arms from there to Nicaragua and to rebels in El Salvador. He was ordered by the White House to tone down the bellicose talk, and through most of 1982 the region got a relatively low policy priority. But last winter Clark, by then transferred to the National Security Adviser's post, began moving to bring Central America back to front and center among Administration concerns. He formed an unlikely alliance with Kirkpatrick, an academic intellectual who is his temperamental opposite but often supplies a detailed rationale for positions that Clark reaches by instinct.

Clark in February dispatched Kirkpatrick to the region on a fact-finding tour. She returned with a gloomy assessment of the entire Central American situation. Her findings prompted the Administration to ask for an additional $110 million in military aid to El Salvador in fiscal 1983, on top of Reagan's original request for $61.3 million. Another point on which Clark and Kirkpatrick agreed, with the support of CIA Director William Casey, was that Thomas Enders, then in charge of Latin American policy at the State Department, should be replaced. They felt that Enders was moving too slowly and cautiously. In May, Clark took the lead in getting Enders ousted and reassigned as Ambassador to Spain, a move that resulted in Clark's primacy over Central American policy.

Though Reagan dramatized the Administration's concern about Central America by giving a speech to an extraordinary joint session of Congress on April 27, the legislators balked at his Salvadoran aid requests. To date Congress has voted only about half of the money the Administration sought. Also during the spring, the right-wing contras stepped up their hit-and-run raids into Nicaragua from bases and training camps in Honduras. By then, it was public knowledge that the CIA was heavily involved in these "cov-

Dear Mike:

It's been a while since we struggled valiently for the passage of Proposition 1 in California. It was, I suppose, a year or so ahead of its time, and a little too complicated...unlike the successful Proposition 13.

Anyway, what I'm writing about is a client of ours, the Whale's Tail Restaurant, in the beautiful Channel Island Harbor (not far from the area you and the Presidential party sometimes arrive).

It's a lovely, dockside restaurant...the finest in the area. The owner, Howard Conant (a long-time active supporter of the President) ~~is inviting you~~ and the Presidential party to be his guest for lunch or dinner during one of your arrivals or departures.

I'm certain you'll find the food and ambience to be excellent, and I know Howard will be delighted to be your host.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Deaver:

Ambassador Gavin complied with the enclosed request for an interview during his July trip to Washington, D.C. The Ambassador did so in the belief that the President, Mrs. Deaver and Mrs. Baker had an interest in the program that Ms. Stebbins is producing, as explained in the enclosed memorandum based on a conversation Ms. Stebbins had with the Embassy's Press Officer.

The Ambassador would like confirmation of whether the President and Mrs. Deaver actually have an interest in the program.

Sincerely,

Roman Popadiuk
Special Assistant

Request for Television Interview

The Ambassador

Through: Stanley A. Zuckerman, PAO

Diane Stebbins, an independent television producer in Washington, D.C., asked whether you would be willing to appear on their program, "Americans Coming Together" sometime soon when you are in Washington. The format of the program is like a news magazine, and consists of interviews and stories on American initiative and volunteers working in communities and with their neighbors. It is, she said, a program supportive of private sector initiatives - following the President's leadership in that field.

Frank Beach is the director of the program and Julian Barber is the host. The filming would take place in the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, blocks from the White House. It would be about a 10 minute segment of the one-half hour program. The rest of the program would consist of something on crime prevention, an interview with a celebrity, a bit on a project on senior citizens, (you), a project on day care centers, and a brief interview with a community leader working on a boys project. (If I understand her correctly.)

Mrs. Deaver and Mrs. Baker would see the tape, and, according to Ms. Stebbins, the President would know of your participation. Her hope is to make the program weekly, it is now done sporadically. The reason for you: because you are quite well known in the United States, said she.
